

I recently became aware that the FCC was considering a new law which would be less restrictive than Indiana's Telephone Privacy Law. I would strongly urge the FCC to reconsider. The American public is under constant stress because of social issues and changes in our work environments. The family is falling apart around us and no one is the least bit concerned especially our government. The government is more concerned with pissing off large corporations who contribute to their pet projects and campaign funds, rather than the people who voted them into office. Interruptions by telephone solicitations during the evening hours should be eliminated. The State of Indiana's law has done this. Our life has dramatically improved with the elimination of these ruthless callers who have absolutely no concern for our private lives.
